THE GROWTH and improvement of the daily newspaper, in itself not a strictly literary event, had a natural and marked effect on political literature. In some ways, that effect was merely temporary. The supersession of the weekly essay, of The North Briton type, by the effusions of the letter writers of 1760-75 in a genuine newspaper 1 was soon cancelled; for the newspapers introduced a daily ...

Daniel Defoe (1660-1731) is now best known as a novelist, but in his own lifetime he was much more famous as a political satirist. This was the great age of poetic satire, and Defoe clearly had ambitions to rival poets like Dryden. Defoe's poetry abounded in savagely satirical sketches of personalities, and lashed corruption and hypocrisy.
